How Does GAF Score Impact Social Security Disability Benefit Approvals?

When an individual with a mental disability applies for Social Security Disability \(SSDI\) benefits, it can be difficult to assess how that disability affects his or her ability to work. Some of these types of disabilities are psychological conditions such as depression, anxiety, bi-polar disorder, schizophrenia, autism and other mental disorders.

To help assess an individual's mental health and work capability, the Social Security Administration (SSA) uses a scale called the Global Assessment of Functioning, or GAF.

GAF Scores

Mental health practitioners use this scale to diagnose, document and offer prognosis on a patient's mental health. The scale runs from 100 to 1 and is grouped by increments of 10: as the number decreases, symptoms and severity of mental health illness increase. Here are some examples of the groupings:

- Score of 91 – 100: the individual can function in daily environments and doesn't experience symptoms of anxiety, depression or mood disorders.
- Score of 51 – 60: moderate symptoms are present, as the individual finds it difficult in social situations and experiences difficulty in getting along with others. He may find it hard to express emotions and suffers occasional anxiety or panic attacks.
- Score of 21 – 30: the individual finds it hard to hold a job, has difficulty communicating with others, experiences constant depression and may have delusions or hallucinations.
- Score of 1 – 10: the patient is capable of hurting himself or others.

GAF Scores are Only Part of the Picture

An applicant's GAF score is just one piece of the puzzle in determining eligibility for SSDI payments.

The SSA will also review:

- All medical records from physicians, psychologists, psychiatrists and mental health professionals
- Admissions to hospitals and other mental health facilities
- Medication types, dosages, effectiveness and side effects
- Opinion of treating physician as to work capabilities

Each case must be assessed individually, and since the GAF score may not be precise, all other data and health records must be incorporated into the review to make an accurate determination as to the individual's ability to work.

An attorney expert in documenting the treating psychiatrist's detailed opinions can help individuals with mental disorders obtain the benefits they have earned.
